

The Flower Lady

An Imperial Dancing Masters Convention took place in the Saxony capital Dresden, in July 1886. Many prominent guests attended the meeting, among them Eduard Reisinger, owner of the Viennese Institute of Noble Dancing Arts, and Mr. Coulon from London, former dance teacher to the Dutch royal family. Among those present was also Professor Higgins, a respected English teacher of phonetics and social etiquette (after all, good manners and proper enunciation form part of social intercourse at dancing classes). During an afternoon walk in Dresden's Old Market Square, the three above-mentioned gentlemen came across a flower seller, Lisa, an attractive girl proffering them her flowers with a lively song and dance, but with guttersnippish manners and in horrible Saxon dialect. The two dancing masters recognised Lisa's dancing talent they would have loved to cultivate, were it not for her uncouth demeanour and repulsive mangled German pronunciation. Still less would be to expect of her, with her lowly origins, to learn another society language, English for example. Yet, professor Higgins was convinced that an ability to speak properly can enable a person join the higher society, and asked to be given five months to prove his theory on Lisa. Herr Reisinger was intrigued by the professor's claim and made a bet: if Higgins succeeds within five months to transform Lisa into a society lady, he would fund her education and instruct her in dancing his new Blumentanz (Flower Dance). Mr. Coulon, however, declared the bet valid only under the condition that the young lady would also master the well-known Quadrille Française, in the elegant royal variation with the final Galop – his own Coulon's Quadrille. For Lisa now started a hard and demanding time. Our three gentlemen had agreed that the final test should be the forthcoming Advent Ball in Prince Albrecht's Palace in Dresden. What they did not expect was the surprise that the, by now, enchanting Fair Lady was going to spring on them; she had found in the ladies fashion magazine Bazar a description of an until now unknown dance – the Stars-Waltz-Cotillion. In her excitement she would break into a song „I Could Have Danced All Night“...

Welcome to an evening of sparkling dances, rousing tunes and heaps of phonetic faux pas!

The dances to be taught during the course

- * The Flowers Dance, consisting of six figures, from the original manuscript by E. Reisinger (Vienna 1885), is a typical Viennese quadrille danced in a longwise set. Each figure represents one fragrant flower – violet, carnation, reseda, rose, camelia, and forget-me-not. The appealing formations and step variations with touches of polka and chassé-waltz are danced to the original music by Eduard Strauss.
- * The Coulon's Quadrille is an elegant royal variation on the Quadrille Française, danced in a square set (Coulon, London 1873). The distinctive feature of this quadrille is that the head and side couples always dance at the same time, forming new unusual figures. It is danced to the music of J. Strauss Sr.
- * The Waltz Cotillon "Die Sterne" (The Stars) appeared in the "Berliner illustrierte Damen Zeitschrift – Der Bazar" (Berlin Illustrated Ladies Magazine – The Bazar) on 23rd January 1864, and its showy figures are danced in formations of 16 couples. The author of this cotillon is not known.
- * The Triplet, a lively medley - very popular in the English ball rooms - comprising the Galop, Valse à deux temps and the English Polka (Charles Durang, 1856)
- * The Redowa was a well-loved new fashionable waltz dance in mazurka style with step variations. Its choreography, incorporating right and left turning, is based on European and American sources. It was introduced by M. Coulon in London in 1846.
- * On the ball night we'll enjoy further simple cotillon figures, like "Snowballs" and "Snowflake Stars" and, of course, waltzes, polkas and polka mazurkas.
